WILLY MILL-THE GAZETTE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY S, 1881. A DETECTIVE ON SOCIAL SCIENCE. Let the tourists and romancers and adorers of the wild and sublime say what they please, there is nothing that recommends itself more to the eye and heart than the rural scenery of England. I let down the window to enjoy the morning air that blew so wholesomely on my temples, and the change of temperature instantly roused Mr. Pocock.

"Morrow, sir!" said he. "I hopes you've rested well. I've had my forty winks, and feel all the better for it.

"I fear, Mr. Poecek, that I have somewhat disturbed your slumbers." "Not in the leastways. I allers like to look about me a bit before breakfast-specially in the country, which is inwigorating. There's no denying that it's a pretty thing to see the sheep and cattle in the green fields, fattening up before they come to London, which is their especial destination; and I'm one of those who thinks that the agricultural interest ought to be supported. For all that the League chaps can say-and a precious lot of gabblers they are-it is the bones and beef of the nation; vot's liberty without beef and beer? I hates innowations, and though I am town bred, no man will persuade me that the whiff of a hayfield isn't sweeter than the smoke of a factory.' "I quite agree with you, Mr. Pocock; but I should have expected that gentlemen of your profession would have taken a different view." "Ah! you mean because the best part of our business comes from the other quarter. Well, that's true. It's the rogues and swindlers that gives us work, and they are for the most part to be found in the big towns. I don't deny, master, that I likes to see the trade brisk. It's a duil thing to be picking ones nails, and doing nothing: and I allers likes to hear of a good bit of burglary or a stunning plant that rekvires a man of gumption to ferret it out. It's in them sort of cases that a man can show his real parts; and it's a happiness to know that the sporting prospects is good, as they say in "Bell's Life," when cub-foxes is plenty. I ought to be thankful for the blessings vouchsafed," added Pocock, piously, " for I've end of coves to draw, and am sure of a find in each of them, though my district does not extend far beyond the liberties of London."

Then, I suppose, you know most of the regues by head-mark? "Lord love your greenness, no! I leaves that to the regular police. I takes no note of coves that has three black chalks against their name. and is to be conwicted on common evidence .--That's subordinates' duty. In course, I knows some of the poor things, and they knows me, and afters touches their hats in the street; but they don't bolt round corners, as they would do if they saw a common peeler. They say to one another, 'That's the great Mr. Pocock, at the head of his perfession-he's on the look out for swells, and don't trouble hisself with ely faking or sich like; and no more I does. If a gentleman will leave his hankerchief half out of his pocket, it's no basiness of mine to look after it; and I don't keep an insurance office for tickers. I hates low practice, and leaves that to my juniors.'

"Now if you take no cognisance of the outeasts of society, Mr. Pocock, where can you find an adequate field for your genius?" But Aristotle, in reply to some rash question of his juvenile pupil Alexander, could have curved his lip with more delicate sarcasm than dis Pocock when I hazarded the above interrogatory. "If there was common sense in the world-ny, as much as there is timber in the head of my waiking staff-I'd be sitting this blessed day in Parliament, as member for Southwark or the Tower Hamlets; 'stend of which they returns fellows as is all slack-jaw, without von particle of gump-It's there I should be, master, if they know'd the right man for the right place; and I'm blessed if I wouldn't big-wigs! See here now, it's the fashion now a days to shove everything else aside to make way for trade and commerce, which is about as sensible a thing for the great country to do as if I vos to order every other kind of wehicle off the street cause of a big adwertising van that goes nigh for to choke up the throughfare. Trade's a werry good thing, but it can take care of itself, and doesn't rekvire a vet murse, which is vot Sir Bobby pretends to be .--Fact is, people are in too great a hurry by half to get rich. They won't allow for the growing-time, which is clear contrary to nature ; and that's vot makes rascals, and fine work for gentlemen of my profession."

"Then you don't approve of the go-ahead principle, Mr. Pocock?" "Now when the devil holds the stakes," replied the detective officer. "In my young days, a chap who expected to get on in the world began life as a shopman or a cierk, worked hard, didn't troubl himself about finery, took his pint of beer and a stroll into the country on Sundays, and if his master gave him a rise of five pounds in his salary, was as happy as king. He didn't know what debt was, but was allers laying by a little; and in process of time he got on, become a foreman, or may-hap was taken into partnership, and might be chosen Deputy for his ward. Other lads than Dick Whittington have risen to be Lord Mayors from quite a small beginning, but that sort of living dent' suit the young chaps now a-days. They must needs dress out like tip-top swells, go to casinos and theatres, smoke cigars, and take up with the blowers. Them sort of diversions run away with cash, if a man has it; and if he hasn't, vv he must find it somewhere and the till's conwenient. Then the upper kind of clerks, they want to set up in business for theirselves; and as they have no capital, they get credit from the banks hooking in their uncles, or some stupid old fogic to be security. Then at it they go, driving a roaring trade-buying here, selling there-and working away with bills, stend of hard cash, which is the foundation of all prosperity. Lord love you! I knew them that would think nothing of taking up goods to the extent of twenty thousand pounds and sending them on speculation to China or the Sandwich Islands. That's vot they call a dashin usiness; and the Parliament folks look at nothing but the export tables, make a song about them, and lick themselves all over, like a cat before rainy weather, for delight at what they call the progress of the country! Vot signifies exports if they ain't paid for? Eh, master? Wouldn't a a word or two about that do more good in Parliament than them flummery speeches about the grand principle of competition?" "Decidedly, Mr. Pocock-some of our leading statesmen would derive no small benefit from your experience and advice."

"That's it, master! They wants the eyes of a detective, and knows little or nothing of what goes on among the middle classes. And then they are easily gammoned! They make a show of knowing about trade when they are as innocent as babbies; and a real clever cove that has brass enough about him can persuade them of almost anything. But I was speaking of the smart young merchants. They are a levely set of pups, and no mistake They have their country boxes, and their mistres ses, and their horses, and their sideboards of plate, as fine as any nobleman in the land; and how think you they manage that? Why, by credit. which is just like wine or spirits-a good thing if taken moderately, but the devil and all if carried to excess. Well, there comes a time of pinch .-Bankers get nervous, and insist on advances be ing paid up. Some of the chaps-who, mind you, are the grand exporters-quietly walks into the trazette; not afters without having made some lit tle provision which it would bother their creditors to find out. They are the best of the whole lot for they panish the joint-stock banks, who werry richly deserve it. But some bold on-swindle. cheat and forge-till they have ruined every soul within their reach, and then make a bolt to the Continent or America, leaving a written statement to show that they are the wictims of unmerited persecution. It's a rum world, sir-a rum world! and the more I sees of it, the more conwinced am I that no kind of reform will be worth a button unless it specially provides that the detective profession shall be represented in the House of Com-
